I can use Lightroom's iPad app to quickly deliver images to Photoshop for high resolution work, or to convert them to PSD so I can work on the edits there. Or I could make the large PSD for a web gallery, then put the images into Lightroom as single versions for fleshed out conventional editing. All of these capabilities are available through the update. I should note that while Lightroom is wildly successful in the capture and management of images, image editing is not its strongpoint. That is actually Photoshop, and this is particularly clear in the features in Lightroom that Photoshop lacks, such as the organizational tools for working with large collections of images in folder structures. I always find myself needing to work in Photoshop to achieve the effects I want to create. That's not something I can say about Lightroom. Adobe's Cloud, as it is known, is a great way to collaborate, and Lightroom makes it super easy for people to do this. Adobe has been releasing Lightroom updates more frequently since 2013, and I have been enjoying using them, so let's see what's been added and how I feel about it. The earlier versions of Lightroom were an image organizer and catalog manager, but the latest version goes much further. Now with Lightroom 5, you can create a snapshot of your edits, send them out to PNG and TIFF, and have them come back to you in real time. You can reply to comments on these images in real time, as you do whatever tool is best at the moment. It's like having your own internet review panel.
